Emmitt J. McHenry was born on July 12, 1943 in Forrest City, Arkansas. His parents, Mary Thurman Barnett and Herman McHenry, were born both in 1925 in Arkansas. McHenry recalls maternal family stories passed down about the supernatural and about lynchings—there were spiritual healers and psychic readers on both sides of the family. McHenry’s paternal grandmother was a minister and his mother worked as a presser, in retail, and as a nutritionist in the Arkansas public school system. McHenry’s father served in the U.S. military and worked as an auto-mechanic and traveling gospel singer. McHenry was sent to school in Kansas City, Missouri for the first grade and later sent to live with his paternal grandmother in Tulsa, Oklahoma at twelve years old. McHenry recalls his childhood hobbies and interests, as well as his grade school teachers and the vibrant community in Tulsa, Oklahoma.

Emmitt McHenry describes how he and other black executives at Allstate Insurance Company strategized to make space for African Americans in senior positions. The group met privately to establish a support system for lower-ranking black executives. McHenry was promoted several times at Allstate but left in order to focus on his own company, Network Solutions, a domain name registrations company. Network Solutions became the sole registrar for internet domain names in the early 1990s. The company also was first to approach the National Science Foundation about commercializing domain name registration.

It was later sold to Science Applications International Corp (SAIC). At the time of the interview, McHenry operated two companies, NetCom Solutions International and VisuTel. He describes his hopes and concerns for the African American community, talks about having grown up in poverty, and considers his legacy.
